Begin's Coalition Wins Confidence Motion on Golan

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin's ruling Likud coalition Wednesday easily defeated, by a vote of 57-47, a parliamentary vote of no confidence stemming from a deterioration of U.S.-Israeli relations over the annexation of the Golan Heights.

The motion, introduced by the two members of the Shinui faction and supported by the opposition Labor Party, accused the government, of precipitous action and miscalculating possible reaction by the United States, which suspended the U.S.-Israeli strategic coop-

While not retreating from the government's position on the Golan Heights issue, Mr. Shamir's speech was conciliatory in tone, saying that Israel would do a disservice to the United States if it did not express its views openly and frankly.

Reagan Set to Speak On Moves Over Poland

WASHINGTON — Amid heightened concern over the Polish situation by Western allies, President Reagan Wednesday prepared a television address to the American people, weighing "an array of political, diplomatic, security and economic measures" that the United States might take against Poland and the Soviet Union.

In Brussels, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization expressed ments in Poland, but diplomatic sources in Brussels said that no decision had been made by the NATO Council on possible sanctions against Warsaw or Moscow,

In Washington, Mr. Reagan met with his national security advisers

Wednesday — the third meeting in three days — before an address from the Oval Office scheduled Wednesday night. Edwin Meese 3d, the White House counselor, indicated that options being considered included steps against the Soviet Union.

"I would say we are looking at every possible step that needs to be taken either in relation to the Pol ish regime or in relation to the Soviet Union to prevent the situation from getting worse, and hopefully to work for improvements as far as the Polish people are concerned," Mr. Meese said Tuesday.

Mr. Meese and other adminis-tration officials would not discuss the options or say whether Mr. Reagan actually would announce any U.S. action. "It may just be a toughening of the rhetoric," an of-ficial said privately.

The White House adviser said that the administration was "looking at an array of political, diplomatic, security and economic mea-sures that might be taken" in connection with the events in Poland. We will consider anything at any time that may be necessary."

Asked whether the United States is considering suspending the talks in Geneva with the Soviet Union on limiting medium-range missiles in Europe, Mr. Meese said that the administration was proceeding with the negotiations be-cause they are in the best interest of world peace.

"If at any time we find that the conduct of the Soviets is such that it is not in our interests to go for-ward with those talks ... then we would make that decision," Mr. Meese said.

Meanwhile, Sen. William Proxmire, Democrat of Wisconsin, released a letter to the president in which he urged Mr. Reagan to prepare for a NATO-wide trade boycott of the Russians if they intervene in Poland.

Lawrence S. Eagleburger, the assistant secretary of state for European affairs, who is touring Western capitals, conferred with high officials from the French, British and West German foreign ministries in Brussels on Tuesday to discuss possible trade sanctions or other steps against the Soviet Union, sources said.

No details of Mr. Eagleburger's talks were released, but the U.S. official was understood to have suggested suspending Western fi-nancial aid to Poland and delaying examination of Poland's application to join the International Monetary Fund, they said.

He also suggested that Western food aid should continue only if there were guarantees that it would reach needy civilians and not be used by the authorities to consolidate their power, the sources add-

Call Saying U.S. General Will Die Is Regarded as a Probable Hoax

ROME - Italian police said Wednesday a telephone call claiming kidnapped U.S. Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier's body would be found was probably a hoax, possi-bly an attempt by the Red Bri-gades to heighten tension over his disappearance.

On Tuesday, the Beirut office of the Italian news agency ANSA received an anonymous phone call from someone who said Gen. Do-zier's body would be found in an Italian village Tuesday night. Italian police said they took the call seriously at first, but as the night passed, they began to suspect it was a hoax.

'We don't believe the call," said an Italian police official who asked not to be identified. "It's probable that they're doing this to distract the police."

Police said they arrested a man they described as insane who they believe called the Trento office of ANSA and dictated a message in German about the kidnapping. Police said the man apparently had no connection with the Beirut call.

Amid 'Direct Popular Rule,' Qadhafi Hangs Onto Power People's Committees Are Reportedly Guided Into Backing the Colonel's Decisions

By Edward Cody

Washington Post Service TRIPOLI, Libya — A Libyan television editorialist, speaking sgainst a background of modern tanks bucking across the desert, was denouncing President Reagan the other night as "a hateful crusader" when, without warning, a 19th-century cavalry charge appeared on the screen.

Unperturbed, the speaker went on exhorting his listeners to defend Libya as the "base of a new Islamic civilization" until he was cut off in mid-sentence by a muezzin calling the faithful to evening prayer. The backdrop faded into a picture of a mosque surrounded by spring flowers. As guests at a seaside hotel here heard the plaintive koranic verses, they noticed the aggressive Muzak beat of "Sanurday Night Femal" in the distribution of the help change.

"God help us," sighed a Lebanese businessman.
Life in Libya these days is an exercise in such stark and sometimes zany contrasts. For the businessman, it is a country with a vast amount of oil money to spend but with a bureaucracy so untrained and confused that he cannot find the right official with whom to deal Many Americans who have lived in this country say Libyans are warm, hospitable people despite their exposure to relentless government propaganda depicting Uncle Sam as a blood-soaked grim reaper and the United States as "the leader of world terrorism."

Puzling Regime

And for diplomats trying to analyze the leadership of Col. Moamer Qadhafi, it is a puzzling regime that in theory has abandoned government in favor of "direct popular rule" by "people's committees" but in fact holds real power closely within the five-man revolutionary committee of army offi-cers who brought Col. Qadhafi to power in 1969.

Somewhere in these contrasts, the diplomats say, lies an answer to the question of whether the Reagan administration is right in charging that Libya has dispatched teams to assassinate the U.S. president or other high officials. Although none of the diplomats profess certainty, they generally consider the accusations overdrawn because of what they say is a new effort by Col. Qadhafi in recent months to shed his image of being an international troublemaker.

"Unless the Americans show us some proof, we cannot support them," said an ambassador from a West European country known for its friendly relations with the United tates. "And they have shown us nothing."

The Europeans have had their own experiences with the Libyan problem. Several Libyan opponents to Col. Qudhal's rule have been shot in Britain, Italy, Greece and West Germany over the last 18 months. In most cases, investigations indicated that Libyan gummen acted on orders from someone in Tripoli. And the French Embassy here was burned in February, 1980, two months after the U.S. Em-

Jalloud Explanation

Responding to official protests, Maj. Abdel Salam Jal-loud recently told the Europeans that the terrorism was the result of overzealous members of "revolutionary committees" who went beyond their leadership's orders. Maj. Jalloud, Libya's second most visible leader, assured European envoys that such violence would no longer be tolerated. Maj. Jalloud's assurances were welcomed and to some extent believed, but his explanation was received with skep-Libya in principle no longer has a government. Indeed, it is no longer a republic, but a hamihirivah, an Arabic term meaning roughly "rule of the masses."

Ministries have become "secretariats." managed in theory by a "popular committee" composed of bureaucrats and other interested citizens who may or may not have practical knowledge about the field involved. As a result, high ministry officials spend a lot of time dealing with personnel ques-tions raised by the committee and explaining what the sec-retary — who used to be called a minister — is trying to

The task of the undersecretary is to explain the decisions to the people [serving on committees] whose approval is needed to forward the decisions to the council of ministers." said a diplomat who follows the workings of the government closely. "Of course, I said 'council of ministers,' when actually it is called the General People's Committee."

Accordingly, Abdul Athi Obeidi, whose job would carry the title of foreign minister in other countries, is known as out a foreign policy defined by Libya's "popular committees." Following guidance from the committees, he is to report to Giadallah Azuz Talhi, in effect premier with the title of secretary of the General People's Committee. In fact, however, separate revolutionary committees par-allel the people's committees in ministries, towns and villages. The revolutionary committees are officially assigned to inspire and animate members of the people's committees. According to well-informed foreigners, the revolutionary committees actually are there to make sure Col. Qadhafi's decisions are approved,

It is against the background of this steering system staffed largely by young zealots imbued with the principles stated in Col. Qadhaff's three-volume "Green Book" and carefully managed by Maj. Jalloud — that European diplomats here dismiss Maj. Jalloud's suggestion that terror teams could have left for Europe or anywhere else without approval from the top.

"We know that in 99 percent of the cases, the revolutionary committees are kept in a straitjacket, that they are told what to do," said one diplomat, "so why would they be able to do something like that on their own?"

In practice, he added, Col. Qadhafi personally shapes all major decisions, on oil policies as well as foreign or military The 39-year-old revolutionary chief has just one title, commander in chief of the armed forces. He is referred to in official Libyan parlance only as "brother leader." In addition, he is reported to take special care to include the top revolutionary committee's other four members in what are presented as collective decisions. But foreign analysts here say that behind the scenes he has increase taken command in recent years, with only Gen. Mustafa

French Tests Of A-Devices To Continue

Officials Shrug Off Protests in Pacific

> By Greg MacArthur The Associated Press

PARIS - Shrugging off growing concern throughout the South Pacific, France exploded two nuclear weapons underground early this month at the Polynesian atoll of Mururoa.

Twenty-one years after it entered the nuclear club, France shows no inclination to slow down its nuclear testing program.

The latest protest was made Monday by the Territorial Assembly of French Polynesia, which requested a temporary halt to nuclear tests at Mururoa.

The assembly voted 17-13 to ask Paris to suspend the tests pending an inspection of the atoll by an "independent team" of "French and foreign radiobiologists." It said the inspection was needed to answer "the question of the harmlessness or harmfulness of these nuclear tests to the local popula-

In the last few months, there have been reports that the atoll had been severely damaged and was leaking radiation and that the French were testing a neutron war-head. A French official has denied neutron warheads were being test-

There also have been complaints by the French union representing nuclear workers that the atoll's beach was too radioactive for safety; official expressions of concern from New Zealand and Australia about possible nuclear pollution; and a vain attempt by ecologists to inspect the atoll. On Dec. 9, the defense minister. Charles Hernu, told a committee of the National Assembly that the site was completely free of all but normal trace radiation and the tests posed no hazards to nuclear workers, to the neighboring islands in the French Polynesian archipelago or to New Zealand or Australia.

But Mr. Hernu said a storm March 11-12 had dispersed radioactive waste from pre-1975 aboveground testing, contained under an asphalt surfacing.

'New Situation'

The storm created "a new radiological situation," Mr. Hernu said. He declined to elaborate - citing national security — but assured the committee the test site was France abandoned aboveground testing in 1975 under pressure from New Zealand, Australia and South American nations.

Mr. Hernu denied reports that the atoll was crumbling under the repeated underground blasts in into the basalt bedrock of the atoll. One French press report has claimed a nuclear device stuck before reaching the bottom of a shaft and, when fired, split the rock through to the sea.

Mr. Hernu said the atoll was sinking regularly through natural Compression of the coral.

Six years after France's first successful nuclear test, De Gaulle pulled the country out of NATO's military wing.

Although long contested by the leftist opposition, the independent nuclear force and the testing that goes with it have gradually become accepted policy for all parties represented in Parliament, now led by the Socialists.

Two weeks ago, France con-firmed New Zealand's announcement that the two latest tests on Mururoa had taken place Dec. 5 and 8. On Monday, the French External Relations Ministry confirmed it sent a communique to Australia stating the site is free of radioactive pollution, despite the March storm that dispersed radioactive waste.

Searches by Troops Add to Ulster Bitterness

BELFAST - One Saturday morning last month. Angela Cairus, 26, a Roman Catholic bousewife, was awakened at 7:30 by sharp pounding on the door of her modest little red brick house.

"I looked out and there were half a dozen soldiers, so naturally I went right down," Mrs. Cairns re-called. "Winen I opened the door, two of them ran past me, right upstairs, and others came in downstairs, with sniffer dogs. I had to wake up the kids and wait down in the front room with them, while the Brits tore the house apart."

The army found nothing in that particular search, which Mrs. Cairns said lasted more than 90 minutes and even included silting through the floor in the kitchen. But like the dozens of similar searches that the security forces conduct every week in Catholic homes in Northern Ireland, it added another little stream to an ocean of bitterness and resent-

Searches of private residences, conducted without warrants under emergency legislation, are an important part of the battle against terrorism, according to the government. Often, suspected gunmen are flushed out of hiding, or weapons are uncovered.

Ex-CIA Man's Aide

Cairns lives with her husband, George, an unemployed welder, and their children, the searches are also part of a grim mythology that dates back hundreds of years.

Fiercely Republican

Asked if the search on Nov.21 had affected the way that her five children, the eldest of whom is 7. view the British, Mrs. Cairns, Ler eyes flashing with loathing, replied: "No, they've already learned to hate the Brits, just as I learned when I was younger and they were searching my parents' house."

Like many of her neighbors, in a block of row houses still decorated with graffiti supporting the prison hunger strike earlier this year, Mrs. Cairns is fiercely republican. She has a brother serving a 15-year sentence in the Maze prison for the attempted murder of a policeman. Those links may help to explain why the soldiers picked her house

House Search

The British Army does not di-vulge its reasons for selecting a particular house for a search, though it is often thought to be "acting on information," police vernacular for following a tip. The security forces in Northern Ireland have a wide network of informers of varying reliability, and there are also special telephone numbers

Last year, there were 4,106 scarches like the one at the Cairas' residence, including raids on houses that were unoccupied at the time. The government says its records do not reflect how many of those searches were successful in producing either an arrest or some contraband, but many Catholics regard most of them simply as random intimidation or harassment.

Soldiers Are Reluctant

Some of the soldiers, in private conversations, also find the searches distasteful and are reluctant to carry them out. As one young trooper put it, the job of searching private houses in North-ern Ireland is "something that soldiers should not have to do in their own country, another symbol of what's wrong with this whole situaion."

In "A Breed of Heroes, a new novel by a former second enterant here who uses the pseudonym Alan Judd, the protagonist, a young officer named Charles tries to conduct a search politely —
"I'm afraid we're going to have to search your house, Mrs. Ray" but the courtesy does not work.

"There was a silence," a passage in the novel reads. "Charles felt sorry for the people and wanted to say so, but he knew that anything he said or did would be filtered through the medium of his boots, beret, flak jacket and rifle. There was no escaping his role.

So it was at the Cairns' house,
"They didn't break anything, the way they did when they but my girlfriend's house last year," Mrs.
Cairns said, packing up her 2-yearold from the brown, patterned

With his personality, charisma and historical role, Col. Qadhafi is completely in charge and frequently rides roughshod over the other council members, the diplomat added. Another informant said Col. Strikers in Sri Lanka Storm Office United Prest Inter

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — Thousands of workers went on strike Wednesday in the port of Colombo in support of higher pay and one group stormed a trade union office in the port authority building, the police said. There were no reports of injuries or arrests. When riot police arrived at the scene, port officials tried unsuccessfully to persuade the men to go back to their jobs. Union spokesmen put the number of strikers at 14,000 and said the port was paralyzed. Wimal Amarinskera, the port authority chairman, said the strikers represented "only a handful of workers."

Fahd Postpones Visit to the U.S.

JEDDAH, Saudi Arabia — Saudi Arabia's Crown Prince Fahd has ostponed a two-day visit to the United States that was due to begin Jan. 19, the official Saudi press agency said.

The postponement followed a secret visit by the Saudi oil minister, Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani, to President Resgan last weekend, the daily paper Asharq al-Awsat said. Thursday's edition of the paper reports that Sheikh Yamani delivered a verbal message to Mr. Reagan from Prince Fahd and had lengthy talks with U.S. Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig about Israel's move to annex the Golan Heights.

The radio said three other persons were wounded in the attack, which it said occurred Tuesday as the two officials, members of a government team, were riding in a car on a trip to inspect a Shiite Moslem shrine in

It identified the victims as Mojtaba Estaki, representative of the Majlis, or parliament, from Shahr-e Kord, and the area's governor, Imamgholi Jaalarpour. Three other persons — the governor's deputy, the local commander of the Revolutionary Guard and a guardsman - were injured, but they are out of danger, according to the radio.

France in Arms Talks With Egypt

U.S. Now Sees No Crime in Exiles' Training to Overthrow Latin Governments

By Jo Thomas

MIAMI — In a camp near the Florida Ever-ades, the military training of exiles to infil-ate and overthrow the government of Nicara-ia has taken on a special urgency.

"Within three months the situation in Nicar-"Within three months the situation in Nicargus will blow up," Hector Fabian, one of the inban leaders of the exile group, the Intermerican Defense Force, said. The force, hich says that it is financed by Panamanian and Cuban exile groups and fund-raising eforts by Nicaraguans, has been training for nonths. It says that it is dedicated to the cored overthrow of the sovernments of Nicaraguans. rmed overthrow of the governments of Nicargus, Cuba and Panama.

This year, according to Mr. Fabian, 800 exles have been trained in the 78-acre camp west

Miami, and he says at least 100 Nicaragums have been infiltrated across their country's norders to take up arms against their government. One of them was killed in October on the northern frontier, Mr. Fabian said.

Some exiles, such as Rene Selva, one of the Nicaraguan leaders who have been living in exile in southern Florida, are reported to have been able to travel in and out of their country over the northern frontier with Honduras.

The training of exiles in Florida and elsewhere in the United States has been of concern to high-ranking Nicaraguan diplomats. According to Thomas O. Enders, assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs, diplomats "have raised it to our attention a number of times." It is an issue involving basic questions about how the Reagan administration interprets the Neutrality Act of 1794, which forbids a military attack or a conspiracy to attack a nation with which the United States is not at

"As long as they don't hurt anybody and as long as they don't actually conspire to invade in a specific way," Mr. Enders said, the exiles are not breaking the law.

"If you attack a country or assist in an attack on a country, or conspire to do this, all these things are illegal," he said. "However, it is not illegal to have military exercises, guys running around the fields with guns, or to say "Uncle Sam, we're ready when you're ready wink, wink — and here we go."

wink, wink — and here we go. "
"It's a problem of interpretation," Mr. Fabian said. "Under the Carter and Nixon administrations, what we were doing was a crime. With the Resgan administration, no one has bothered us for 10 months."

Mr. Fabian said that he spent eight years directing the New York operations of Orlando Bosch, who proclaimed himself in charge of anti-Castro terrorism in the late 1960s and early '70s. He said that he himself had been interviewed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and by federal grand juries 70 times from 1973 to 1980, but that Dec. 5, 1980, "was the last time the FBI bothered me."

He said that the cause was a change in attirude in Washington. For the first time in 20 years, the United States is disposed to defend its own interests. Now, our fight fits. We're doing nothing against the law. We are on private property, and we have no automatic

A recent visit to the camp itself indicated that the military training was more disciplined and the trainees were more fit and more serious than they were in a visit earlier this year. A greater number also seemed to be Nicaragnalthough some were from Honduras as well as Cuba, Panama, Venezuela, Colombia and the Dominican Republic.

The training course, which began Oct. 7 and is scheduled to end Jan. 28, is held on weekends and on Wednesdays and Thursdays and provides instruction in parachute jumping, ur-ban warfare, guernila warfare, day and night navigation and training for frogmen. According to Mr. Fabian, the students are those who will serve as officers when they reach Nicara-gua. The weapons being used were AR-15s, the civilian version of the military M-16 rifle, and Ruger Mini-14s, carbines that use M-16 car-

The instructors include former U.S. Army Rangers and Vietnam veterans. Of these, Mr. Fabian said, four are Americans with no family ties to the exile communities, 11 are of Cuban descent and seven are Nicaraguans.

Mr. Fabian said that he and several other

Cubans, including the commander of the camp, Jorge González, better known by his nickname, "Bombillo," or "Light Bulb," had approached officials at the Department of State and the Department of Defense in search of assistance but have so far received nothing. "We want arms and air support," Mr. Selva said.

In Washington, a knowledgeable source in the Reagan administration said that the exile groups had indeed made an approach and he official said that no intelligence agency had of-fered or planned to offer any support.

In testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on Nov. 12, however, Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig Jr. declined to give assurances sought by a committee member, Rep. Gerry E. Studds, Democrat of Massachusetts, that the United States would not support or encourage Nicaraguan exile groups in the United States or Honduras who might be trying to weaken or overthrow the Sandinis-ta government in Nicaragua.

"Our goal," Mr. Fabian said, "is the liberation of Nicaragua, Cuba and Panama, al-though the struggle in Nicaragua is more ad-vanced, and we've intensified our efforts." In the future, he said, the group hopes to use Ni-caragua as a base for an attack against the government of Cubs and to assist in a military coup to overthrow the successors of Gen. Omar Torrijos, the late Panamanian leader.

particularly as it would operate in bad weather at National, which has short runways. Among other things, Mr. Helms was said to be concerned about possible engine failures and the plane's ability to stabilize before landing when using the curving approach to Run-way 18 to the south, a runway used for about 45 percent of all arrivals.

Mr. Helms, a former test pilot, personally flew the A-300 into National several times on Dec. 5 to see for himself how it handled before he made his final decision, transportation officials said. Eastern officials said Tuesday there was an honest disagreement over the technical aspects of the plane's ability at National. "We think the airplane is safe there or we wouldn't have suggested using there," Mr. Borman said. He said Eastern would take Mr. Helms' points and, in conjunction with flight test data from Airbus Industrie, "hope to convince him that the airplane is acceptable" at National.

Department closed its investiga-tion of Richard V. Allen, President filed when he became national sean's national security adviser on Wednesday, but a presidential spokesman said Mr. Allen is still the subject of an "internal review" at the White House.

Attorney General William French Smith said he found no reason for appointing a special prosecutor over the remaining questions that prompted Mr. Allen to take administrative leave, with pay, on Nov. 29. But Peter Rouselle, a deputy White House press secretary, refused to say whether Mr. Allen could now return to his duties.

Internal Review

Mr. Rouselle said only that the "internal review" at the White House "will be conducted expeditiously and thoroughly now."

The Justice Department cleared Mr. Allen on the two questions that remained after it closed its investigation concerning his receipt of $1,000 from two Japanese journalists. Specifically, the announcement said no reasons were found

About three weeks ago, the Justice Department rilled that there were no grounds for appointing a special prosecutor to look into the $1,000 that Mr. Allen received after arranging an Inauguration Day interview last January with the president's wife, Nancy Reagan. But the department said it was still looking into the gift watches and irregularities in Mr. Allen's financial statements.

Mr. Smith said Wednesday he determined that the watches that Mr. Allen accepted were the gifts of his personal friends, Mr. and Mrs. Tamotsu Takase, and had nothing to do with the interview.

Arguing that many rebel units are still poorly armed, Salvador Cayetano Carpio, 62, leader of the Popular Forces of Liberation, denied U.S. charges that the guerilas were receiving armaments from Cuba and Nicaragua. "Our arms are those we manufacture or take from the enemy at the cost of our own blood," he said.

"But the supplies are evidently unequal," he said. "While Yankee imperialism provides the assassins of the people with unrestricted amounts of increasingly modern weapoury, the forces of liberation do not receive even a rifle."

Referring to Washington's op-position to direct negotiations between the guerrilla-led opposition and the civilian-military junta, Mr. Carpio also charged the Reagan administration with seeking "its evil and inaccessible objective of annihilating the revolutionary forces militarily, even if this sinks the entire population in genocide."

He called for a worldwide campaign "to break the present wall of reservations and vacillations" and to provide the rebels with the armaments "that our people needs in order to defeat the imperialist ag-

Mr. Carpio's appeal came at the end of a long article written by him for the leftist Mexican weekly Por Esto. Since he has long shunned press interviews, the article provided a rare opportunity to analyze his views.

Battle Ensued

Three mornings later, as they hid in thick grass near a river bank, a helicopter landed nearby and unloaded 15 soldiers, Mr. Carpio reported. Inside the helicopter, he said, he saw one of about 30 U.S. military advisers currently assigned to train Salvadoran troops.

Here we had in view a hated adviser from the Pentagon, person-ally directing the operations of tactical units in the battlefield," he said, "while the false propaganda from Washington tells the world that its advisers do not participate in the conduct of operations." Mr. Carpio said that the cry of SAN SALVADOR (AP) Guerrillas attacked the port city of La Unión and held it for at least an hour before troops loyal to the ruling junta forced them to with-draw, an army spokesmen said Tuesday.

The spokesmen said guerrillas armed with Chinese-made rocket grenades attacked the city, about 118 miles (190 kilometers) southeast of the capital, on Monday night and kept it under siege until early Tuesday. There were no im-

Church Organization In South Africa Faces Investigation on Funds

By Caryle Murphy Washington Post Service

JOHANNESBURG — The government has ordered an investigation into the South African Council of Churches because of allegations of financial irregularities.

The investigation, ordered re-cently by Prime Minister Pieter W. Botha, could lead to restrictions on money sent from the overseas churches that now provide most of the council's funds. Under the leadership of an Anglican bishop, Desmond Tutu, the council is a champion of black grievances against apartheid.

The irregularities, which were brought to the attention of council officials by its former ombudsman and internal auditors, appear to involve sloppy bookkeeping, misjudgments, mismanagement and the questionable use of some unaudited funds, rather than theft or

But the scope of the investigation appeared to support a wide-spread belief that its purpose was not only to examine financial problems but also to discredit the council, which officials have accused of subversion. The panel has been asked to examine "the inception, development, objects, history and activities" of the council as well as the "organizations and people con-nected with giving such money or

Anti-Council Actions

The government has acted gainst the council in the past. In 1979, according to newspaper re-ports, it secretly provided more than $350,000 to a rightist Christian group that was to run a covert campaign against the council in an attempt to break its influence among English-speaking churches.
The effort had little effect.

"They have been gunning for the council, gunning for me, and they would latch onto any excuse with considerable alacrity," he said. "If we weren't doing the things we are doing if we did not The government is believed to have been angered by the council's payments for the legal defense of political defendants, its support for civil disobedience against what the council says are discriminatory laws and its encouragement of conscientious objection to military

At the parade, the Western diplomat said, the unit came under rocket fire, apparently by members of the regular army resentful of the new force, and five of its members were killed.

Some residents forecast a showdown between the new force, which is being trained by former British Army men from a London security company called Falcon Star, and the regular army, some of whose officers are being trained in the United States and some units of which are being instructed by 40 newly arrived North Korean military advisers.

The creation of the new force means there are. four distinct armed units associated with Mr. Obote's government. They are the army, numbering about 15,000; the police, with 10,000 men; a ragge militia of 5,000; and the new force, which is dosigned to grow to 5,000 from its present 600.

Capricious Violence

Ranged against these forces, Western diplomats identify six guerrilla groups, which have thus far failed in their campaign to remove Mr. Obote and which were the object of a recent sweep by the army just west of Kampala. The conflict between the armed groups spawns a violence that seems almost capricious.

According to a senior relief official, 300 people have died in the last three months in Uganda as a result of campaigns against anti-government "dissidents," revenge killings by the army and random

Much of the tension in Uganda dates from the brutal years, between 1971 and 1979, when Idi Amin held power. Marshal Amin was deposed by Tanzanian troops, 1,500 of whom remain in Uganda, and Ugandan rebels in late 1979.

Mysteries Persist

A mystery, however, surrounded events during a 20-hour period when the man who is now wice president, Paulo Mawanga, refused to publish the elec-tion results. The diplomat said that in those 20 hours the results in "four or five" constituencies, which had been won by the Democratic Party, were reversed and announced as victories for Mr. Obeta. Two Western journalists who sought verification of this report were unable to make inquiries at an official level because they were refused the accusary accreditation by the Ugandan government.

Since his return to power, Mr. Obote has released 3,000 prisoners detained for their role in the "liberation war" against Marshal Amin's forces. At the same time. Western officials involved in montering Uganda's human rights record say many other peo-ple have been detained, often in connection with the activities of anti-government guerrillas.

Mr. Obote has displayed astuteness is attracting Western aid for his country's economic recovery and in balancing rival power blocs.

According to Western diplomats, the consensus in other Western governments, including the United States, is that Mr. Obote is probably the most able politician in Uganda and, whatever the flaws in the election that brought him to power and other "irregularities," his newly found Western inclina-tions render him a worthy candidate for support.

Government Sees Nothing Funny In Prediction of Gandhi's Death

National Pastime

Making astrological predictions about Mrs. Gandhi and her family appears to be a national pastime here, although few are cast in as specific terms as those used by Mr. Shastri.

When Mrs. Gandhi's son, Sanjay, was killed in an airplane crash in June, 1980, for example, many astrologers claimed they had predicted his demise. It was difficult, however, to tell from reading their columns what they had foreseen, although some claimed to have held back what they really felt in deference to the Gandhi family.

Two of Mr. Shastri's predictions concerning the prime minister were quite specific. In the first, made last June, he said Mrs. Gandhi was likely to be assassinated in September, followed by her son, Rajiv, a member of Parliament and since Sanjay's death the heir apparent to the Nehru-Gandhi dynasty that has ruled India for most of the 34 years since independence. Mr. Bahuguna then would become prime minister, according to the forecast - which, of course, has been disproved by events.

Nonetheless, Mr. Venkatasub-baiah said, the police began watching the astrologer because the pre-dictions were "alarming."

The minister told Parliament that Mr. Shastri, whose real name was given as Ram Avtar Gupta, was free on bail on a charge of kidnapping a young woman.

Beatlemania in the Auction Room 'Mrs. Tanqueray': A Crisp Staging

By Sheridan Morley

International Herold Tribune ONDON — Pinero's "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" is now to be found on the National's Lyttelton stage in a crisply excel-lent and elegant revival, the first in the capital for more than 30 years, by Michael Rudman. In line with the Maugham and Priestley rediscoveries of the late 1970s, this seems to be precisely the right mix of historical curiosity and major drama for the proscenium-stage repertoire of the National, and it is marvelous to see it approached with a flair and confidence that I have not always noticed around the South Bank of late.

Essentially, this is one of the first of the problem plays, an English answer to "Hedda Gabler" and "A Doll's House" (which were first seen in London around 1890) and a forerunner to Shaw, who, predictably, loathed it. The problem - that of a woman with a past who fails to come to terms with the horrendous discovery that one of her former lovers is about to marry her stepdanghter - now might not get you more than a couple of minutes on a midnight radio phone-in.
But for the 1890s what made

"Tanqueray" so scandalous was its muted suggestion that a society that tolerated curiously nasty double standards (whereby a chap could philander with impunity while women were punished for it even unto death) might just possi-bly not be the best of all societies. Pinero was a cautious critic, and his play reaches no very radical conclusion, but it is a fundamen-tally feminist piece about male hypocrisy and the tragic consequences of living according to how you believe society should work in-stead of how it actually does, and that in itself for 1893 was as revo-lutionary as Coward's "The Vor-tex" or Osborne's "Look Back in

To the title role, which once had Mrs. Patrick Campbell chewing the scenery, Felicity Kendal brings a welcome lightness of touch and an enchanting kind of timelessness that takes the edge off some of the play's more stilted moments, for mevitably the plot creaks a bit now and you can see the dust gathering in some of its corners. But around her Rudman has built up a strongly in-period team led by Leigh Lawson as a matinee-idol Tanqueray and with Ciaran Madden and Neil Stacy admirable in the chilly last-act mirror image of what the Tanquerays themselves have

Meanwhile, the National's experimental stage, the Cottesloe, continues its exploration of Holly-wood mythology with John Schles-inger's production of "True West," the Sam Shephard play about two California brothers, rousingly well-played by Bob Hoskins and An-thony Sher in one of the great dou-ble acts of our time. Yet by midway through a short evening the illiterate Hoskins has managed to sell his brother's producer an outline for a modern Western, and moreover has con-vinced Sher that the only true test of sibling supremacy should be who can steal the largest number of electric pop-up toasters from unsuspecting neighbors. "True West" is a manically funny play not so much written as assembled from some vast Shephard supermarket of spare dramatic parts, only a few of which come guaranteed to lock together, but in there somewhere is a random

Gothic survey of the new California as well as a play about two brothers who both want to become an amalgam of each other. Seeing it is like flicking the dial of a televi-

A Raccoon Dinner for 350 Good Ol' Boys

Donizetti's 'Alba' Gets Faltering Revival

By William Weaver

FLORENCE — The Teatro Comunale here, after Several brilliant and smoothly run seasons, is going through a bad patch, which Florentine operalovers hope will be transitional. The general manager, Massimo Bogianckino, who has been responsible for a large part of the Comunale's acclaim in recent years, will soon be leaving to assume the artistic direction of the Paris Opera. And Riccardo Muti, the conductor of some of the finest productions here for some time, has allowed his contract as chief conductor to lapse and has publicly expressed his dissatisfaction with the house, announcing that he does not contemplate returning in the immediate future.

This was the background to the gala opening of the winter season, inaugurated with a new production of Donizetti's "Il Duca d'Alba," a rare work, never previously heard in Florence. But the event failed to generate the expected enthusiasm. In fact, the reception was distinctly cold.

Some blamed this tenid welcome on Donizetti. A mystery surrounds "Il Duca d'Alba," which the composer abandoned after most of the work was written. The manuscript, found among his papers, was completed by Matteo Salvi and posthumously performed in 1882. After a few performances in the '80s, it was not staged again until Thomas Schippers revived it, after he too had made some adjustments to the score, at the Spoleto Festival in 1959.

Why did Donizetti never complete it? How much work did Salvi do? And why has the opera never become popular, even in the Donizetti revival in recent decades? The questions are hard to answer, except perhaps the last. This is an opera that, while full of beautiful music, requires alert, sensitive, vigorous conducting if it is to catch and hold the public. In Spoleto, Schippers provided just that kind of compelling guidance. Here in Florence, the undoubtedly gifted young Donato Renzetti seemed out of his element. Accompaniments were slack, some orchestral subtleties were ignored, and the stirring moments notably the patriotic Hymn to Freedom of Act 2 -

Despite the conductor's gray reading, the "Duca d'Alba" indicated its worth when the baritone Renato Bruson, in the title role, was allowed to display his gift for phrasing, along with his warm, intensely human and noble voice. The soprano Ruth Falcon, on the other hand, was clearly nervous and uncomfortable and made little impression, while the tenor Renzo Casellato adopted a loud, plangent sound throughout the evening, a kind of whine that was first boring then irritating.

As director, Mauro Bolognini did little more than

Breaching the Wall

Now that Liza Alexeyeva has reached the United States and been reunited with her husband, the danger is that Western interest in the plight of Russian human rights activists will fade. There is danger, first of all, for Andrei Sakharov himself, whose fast forced the Kremlin into allowing Miss Alexeyeva to emigrate. Without the continued spotlight of Western attention on him, Dr. Sakharov and his wife, Yelena Bonner, who fasted with him, may be vulnerable to revenge for the embarrassing concession the KGB was forced to make.

Dr. Sakharov's fate bears watching, but there are many others in worse circumstances. They do not have the protection of Dr. Sakharov's internationally known name or the highly privileged position afforded by membership in the Soviet Academy of Sciences. Since the end of the Moscow Olympics in August, 1980, Soviet authorities have exiled, arrested or otherwise silenced all branches of the human rights movement in the Soviet Union, including the Helsinki Watch groups, religious groups, nationalists, trade unionists and intellectuals committed to more honest discussion of the regime's strengths and weaknesses.

A few among the many in prison or labor camps are:

• Yuri Orlov, 57, distinguished physicist and founder of the Moscow Helsinki Watch Group, sentenced to seven years in strictregime labor camp, followed by five years of internal exile;

• Anatoli Shcharansky, 33, mathematician, another leader of the Helsinki Watch movement, three years in prison, 10 years in strict-regime labor camp;

• Gleb Yakımın, 47, Russian Orthodox priest, founder of the Christian Committee for the Defense of Believers' Rights, five years of strict-regime labor camp, five years in exile;

• Tatyana Osipova, 32, computer engineer, member of the Helsinki Watch movement, five years of standard-regime labor camp, five years in exile;

• Mykola Rudenko, 61, poet, leader of the Ukrainian Helsinki Watch Group, seven years of strict-regime labor camp, five years

There are many more - Jews, Baptists, intellectuals, Lithuanians, workers - with similar sentences, and still others expelled from the country.

In the opinion of some who have seen both, a worse fate than prison or labor camp is to be condemned to a psychiatric "hospital." Especially troublesome or embarrassing activists are subjected to drugs, shock treatments, beatings and much worse. The harrowing story of this system is recounted in the book "Punitive Medicine" by Alexander Podrabinek, founder of the Working Commission to Investigate the Use of Psychiatry for Political Purposes. Mr. Podrabinek is serving three years in a labor camp. The other members of the small commission have also been arrested and given stiff sentences.

The clear lesson of the Sakharov fast is that criticism from the West makes a difference. It is easy for the ordinary Western citizen to feel powerless against the Kremlin. Sometimes it even seems as though Western attention makes matters worse. Yet exiled Russians all say the same thing: The individuals on whose behalf there is constant pressure from the West may be helped. Without that pressure, activists in or out of prison are surrounded by what Dr. Sakharov calls "a wall of silence," within which the KGB has

The Haitians' Winter

A Christmas plum to Attorney General William French Smith. His Justice Department has not abandoned the idea of sending illegal immigrants who have fled Haiti to detention at icy Fort Drum, N.Y., but now it says it will not do so, at least not during the dead of winter.

To hold poor, desperate people from the tropics in a camp near the Canadian border would be callous. "Siberia," some people say. So we are all for Mr. Smith's conclusion. even though we don't exactly follow his logic.

The attorney general observes that 1,021 illegal Haitian migrants were caught entering the United States in November, 1980, while in November of this year the number was only 47. That, he says, shows that the policy of intercepting and detaining Haitians is "working remarkably well." And it means that existing detention camps in Florida and elsewhere can handle all the Haitian illegals; the Fort Drum plan can be deferred.

But the numbers can be read another way

— as a sign not that the fear of freezing deters migration but that illegal Haitian entrants are struggling much harder to avoid capture. If they were caught in November, 1980, nothing awful happened. They were allowed to stay, even work, pending a hearing on whether they were legitimately entitled to refugee status. Now everyone who is caught is put in a detention camp.

There is another set of relevant new numbers. They show that in fiscal 1981, 503 Haitians applied for asylum as refugees. Compare that with 36,296 Cubans, 7,138 Iranians, 4.111 Nicaraguans, 1.670 Poles, 992 Ethiopians. All told, 63,202 foreigners asked for asylum. Why make such a fuss over a few hundred black Haitians, especially when doing so is sure to engender accusations of racism? Pending remedial action by Congress, less of a fuss should be made over the Haitians. The interim decision on Fort Drum is a welcome step in that direction.

Again: Let Them Both In

. Last week [IHT, Dec. 19-20] we expressed the opinion that the State Department's policy with regard to visas for Northern Irish visitors was either confused or based on a double standard. Confusion arose because the department had denied a visa to a Catholic extremist member of the British Parliament, Owen Carron, while continuing to honor one issued to his Protestant counterpart, Ian Paisley. One need not approve of either man's philosophy, rhetoric or politics to urge that both be admitted temporarily to the United States. They should be.

On Monday the department announced that the double standard would be abandoned and that Ian Paisley's visa would be invalidated forthwith. Mr. Carron and Mr. Paisley will now receive equal treatment. Both will be excluded.

Why? The department's complete statement on the Paisley case consists of three sentences: "Because of our grave concern about the divisive tone of Mr. Paisley's actions and statements in recent weeks, the department initiated a review about three weeks ago to determine whether anything Mr. Paisley had said or done recently had made him ineligible for a visa under our laws. We have concluded that Mr. Paisley's presence in the United States would be prejudicial to the United States' public interest, and his visa has been invalidated. He may not enter the United States." What it all boils down to is this: "We just don't like the guy."

Well, we don't like him either, but we're not afraid to let him - or Mr. Carron come and speak his mind, as long as neither disturbs the peace. A lot of people may decide they don't like Mr. Paisley's col-leagues Peter Robinson and John Taylor, either, yet these two will be allowed to come. Others might not like to hear what Bernadette Devlin McAliskey said on her recent visit to New York, yet she was allowed entry. Where is this line drawn?

A British official was quoted Monday expressing disappointment with the State Department's decision. "We quite honestly thought it would be useful to have the Americans see the kind of thing we are up against." Those who take pride in the fact that American society protects the right to express even extreme views would agree.

Failure in the Kremlin's Empire

The uncertainties about Poland's future and Moscow's intentions highlight yet again the failure of Socialism as practiced in the Soviet sphere of influence. HIROSHIMA — Christmas, the Christian feast day of new life and peace, has turned into a time of killing. Two years ago on Christmas Day, Soviet troops in-vaded Afghanistan. Seven years before, when President Nixon ordered air strikes on North Vietnam, The Times in London published an editorial entitled "The Christmas of the B-52 Bomber."

This Christmas could well see carnage in El Salvador and bloodletting in Poland. Even without this, there will be no Christmas Day armistice, as there was in the trenches of the Western front in 1914 and 1915, for the soldiers fighting in Cambodia, or those in Namibia, Iran and Iraq.

Although we appear to be living in an era when we are spared glob-al war, every other kind of violence is on the increase. Big city violence appears to be waxing worldwide, except in a few places where social controls are unusually powerful, such as the cities of Japan and, unexpectedly, Calcutta.

150 Wars

Local wars between countries that used to live in enforced peace in the days of the Pax Britannica and the Ottoman and French empires are breaking out all over. There have been 150 wars in the postwar" world.

A conversation with Indira Gandhi the other day left me thinking that a nuclear war between India and Pakistan is not too remote a

Moreover, we seem to be on the threshold of a new phase of the Cold War. Détente now looks like a momentary dream in a dark night. The real danger is that every piece of desert in the Middle East or Africa, every micro-state in the Pacific, the Indian Ocean or Cen-tral America, is being drawn onto the strategic chessboard.

The taste for war appears to ebb and flow. War can get so bloody and appalling that mankind is tem-porarily inoculated against it and will do anything to avoid it. This happened in France after the 100 Years War and in Britain after the 1914-1918 war. It also happened, as far as nuclear weapons are con-cerned, after Hiroshima and Nagasaki. It happened in the United States after Vietnam.

But then advantage is taken, po-litical leadership misses its openings, and the cycle beings again. Although most wars are ultimately about territory, it is ideology that seems to provide driving force for the savage killing. A grimly frank insight on this came from one of the most civilized and perceptive men of our time, the Yugoslav Milovan Djilas, in an interview two years ago this month in the British journal Encounter. He confessed the pleasure he got from helping slaughter an Italian battalion which had surrendered to the Yugoslav partisans. *Once you believe you are in the

Just as the Cold War had divided Europe, so détente might help start to remite it. The Helsinki Accords of 1975 tied up the three key strands: human rights, trade, security.

That whole aspect of detente looks awfully sad right now in Po-land. For although the two great powers have not recently enjoyed anything that might be called détente, Europe has.

In their respective manners, Yugoslavia, Romania and Hungary all are living comments on the lim-its of the Soviet appetite and reach in Eastern Europe.

It is premature to say the Polish story is over. The issue is not exively whether Moscow will permit free institutions. The compan-ion issue is the means — the tactics, the policies — by which Poles pursue their birthright of inde-pendence. Why should Eastern Europe be regarded as the only place in the world where such things don't make a difference?

The West remains facing its traditional policy dilemma: offer what help is feasible to enable interested East European countries to lengthen their Soviet leash, or limit relations in order to increase Moscow's costs in Eastern Europe and to demonstrate the inadequacies of Communism.

Dogma, liberal or conservative, is a poor guide to the choices en-tailed. A broad sense of interest serves better. That dictates pragmatism; some of this, some of that, following the head but following the heart, too. Disorderly but, given who we are, unavoidable.

The action was highly emberousing to President Muberak of Egypt, underlining his isolation from the rest of the Arab world at a time when he is trying to bridge that gap. There are some irraeli politicisms who would like to provoke Mubarak to some hospic act from Tel Aviv, for example. They want an excuse not to proceed in April with Israel's final withdrawal from Sinai.

But I believe Begin's purpose in acting so suddenly and dramatically on the Golan Heights, was to disrupt diplomatic moves looking toward Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank in exchange for a peace settlement and security guarantees.

The basic United Nations door-The basic United Nations docu-ment, Security Council Resolution, 242, pointed to such a solution. It called for Israeli, "withdrawal from territories occupied" in the 1967 war and for establishment of "se-cure and recognized boundaries." The implication was that both sides should move.

Sadat

For years no Arab government would make a clear commitment to normal relations if Israel withdrew. Then, in Jerusalem, President Sadat offered "full peace." The bargain, including total taracti abandonment of Egyptian territory, was struck at Camp David.

Lately there have been signs of movement elsewhere. The peace plan put forward by Crown Prince. Fahd of Saudi Arabia last summer implied that an Israel within its 1967 borders would be recognized. Despite the collapse of the Arab Despite the collapse of the Arab summit at Fez in controversy over the Fabd plan, the Reagan admin-istration has been hoping for Sandi leadership in bringing other Arab countries, particularly Jordan, into the peace process.

All this is anathema to Begin, and the reason is no secret. He does not accept the formula of peace, recognition and security guarantees in ceture for withdraw al when it comes to occupied terri-tory apart from Sinat. He believes Israel must keep the West Bank.

That explains why Begin reject-ed the Fahd plan out of hand, while even some of his colleagues wanted to meet it with the traditional Israeli willingness to negoti-ate. He saw that it pointed toward a situation in which the Arabs would be moving to the withdraw-al-peace formula and Israel would be diplomatically exposed as

'No One'

The same logic underlies the de-marche on the Golan. By asserting that it is not subject to negotiation, Begin as good as makes certain that Syria will continue to impose an effective veto on Saudi, Jor-danian or Palestinian participation in the peace process. And that ex-cludes meaningful negotiation about the West Bank.

Most Israelis oppose return to Syria of the Golan Heights, which command northern Israel strategically. And the Syrian government is now in the extremist Arab camp, sponsoring terrorists who prey on moderates in the PLO.

Yet Syria is essential to any general Arab-Israeli peace. Henry Kissinger understood that in 1974, when he pursued his most arduous shuttle diplomacy to obtain a disengagement agreement on the Golan Heights. President Assad of Syria has formally accepted Resolution 242. And some observers thought he would stop boycotting the Fahd plan if he saw some hope of fruitful negotiation on the Golan Heights.

Resolution 242 has been accepted by successive Israeli govern-ments — including Begin's in the Camp David agreement. But he has shown now that he does not read it the way the rest of the world does as allowing at most modest border rectification. He was speaking of more than the Golan Heights when he said: "No one will push us back to the borders of June 4, 1967 — no one, no people, no power will succeed in pushing us back to those borders. borders of bloodshed, borders of provocation and aggression."

PRAGUE — This magnificent medieval city was at its wintry best last week.

But for the people of Czechoslovakia, and many people elsewhere in Eastern Europe, the holiday season was filled with apprehension. The shops were fairly well stocked, but everyone knew the economy was in trouble, with a negative growth rate possible next year and no solution in sight for serious energy problems. And then there was Poland.

Czechoslovaks and Poles are closely related ethnically. They share a long border, their economies are intertwined in many ways, and most Czechoslovaks have Polish relatives or close friends. So for most people here, anxiety was the first reaction to the imposition of martial law in Poland. Having lived through the brutal suppression of their own effort at reform 13 years ago, they hoped there would be less bloodshed in Warsaw and that the succeeding government would be less harsh. At the same time, however, all the ancient At the same time, nowever, all the ancient enmities and prejudices between the two peoples manifested themselves, largely in comments about alleged Polish laziness, lack of discipline and excessive romanticism. "That doesn't mean that the Caribbean or Africa are areas that have been assigned to me for my exclusive concentration," Mr. Clark said. "I have no priorities, and I try to be a utility infielder. I got into the Caribbean Basin thing because we wanted it on the president's agenda at a time when other people wanted to defer its consideration, and I went to South Africa because there was a danger that the Namibia negotiations would get frozen by inertia to the point where the opportunity would be lost.

"Now," he adds, "these matters are on track, for the moment at least, and I can get into other areas that need attention. It might be Europe or the Middle East or someplace

As to the future, Mr. Clark professes to miss life on his ranch, which is being run for the time being by the oldest of his five children, and talks about getting back there before too much longer." However, others see different scenarios about Mr. Clark's immediate future. Within the department, there are many career offi-cials, keenly impressed by his access to the White House, who would like to see him become secretary if and when Mr. Haig leaves. Still others, including some Republican politicians, note that Mr. Meese reportedly would like to be appointed attorney general should the job become vacant; if that happens, they say, Mr. Clark could easily become Mr. Reagan's right-hand man at the White House.

For the present, such ideas remain in the realm of sheer speculation. What is clear, though, is that both Mr. Reagan and Mr. Haig seem very happy having Mr. Clark sitting in his seventh-floor State Department office ready to pick up the telephone when some smoothing out is needed, and that both men probably would go to very great lengths to keep him there.

Mr. Curk's inter nours.

He was unable to identify the prime ininisters of South Africa or Zimbabwe and reacted as though he was hearing for the first time about such matters of international interest as the controversy over placing tactical nuclear weapons in Europe or the split in the British Labor Party. In fact, he seemed like one of the most spectacularly ill-suited candidates for a major foreign policy post in recent times. Even the normally mild-mannered commit-tee chairman, Sen. Charles H. Percy, Republican of Illinois, who reluctantly voted to con-firm Mr. Clark out a sense of party loyalty, layer remarked acidly, "Never again can we accept a man who professes to have no knowledge in the area for which he has been nomi-

But that was eight months ago. In the time since there probably has been no other senior Reagan administration official about whom oranions have changed more radically than the 50-year-old former California Supreme Court justice who is known throughout the State Department as "the judge."

Measure of Power

Mr. Clark's name does not appear in the news very often these days. However, among people familiar with the inner workings of the administration's foreign policy machinery, he is widely regarded as perhaps the most influential and powerful man to occupy the State De-partment's second-ranking job since George Ball in the 1960s.

Mr. Clark's standing within the administra-tion is so high that he frequently is mentioned as a potential successor to his boss, Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig Jr., or as a possible candidate for an important insider's slot at the White House. More recently, as the impression has spread that President Reagan's national security affairs adviser, Richard V. Allen, is on his way out, Mr. Clark's name keeps cropping up prominently in the specula-tion about likely replacements.

He got there partly by making up for his lack of expertise through sheer hard work and a punishing, on-the-job learning process. Although there are still a lot of blank spots in his knowledge of world affairs, Mr. Clark has parlayed his learning ability into a major role in the internal management of the department; and he also has put his mark on such controversial and high-priority administration poli-cies as its approach to combating Cuban infin-ence in the Caribbean and resolving racial ten-sions in southern Africa.

However, Mr. Clark's real importance rests this ability to perform another function for the administration. He is the principal buller, biterpreter, guidance counselor and damagecontrol intermediary between the mercurial Mr. Haig and the palace guard surrounding Mr. Reagan at the White House.

Mr. Clark has been able to fit into that role because he has won Mr. Haig's trust and respect, while retaining his credentials as a member in high standing of the tight circle of Californians — among them the presidential counselor, Edwin Meese 3d; the White House deputy chief of staff, Michael K. Deaver; and Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger who have been among the president's closest political intimates since his days as governor of California.

Office Organizer

It was Mr. Clark who moved in as Mr. Reagan's chief of staff in 1967 when the governor's office in Sacramento was in a shambles and made it run smoothly. He also enlisted Mr. Meese and Mr. Deaver for the Reagan team and spent his 1969 vacation in Washington helping Mr. Weinberger, then a Nixon administration official, reorganize the Federal Trade Commission.

As one longtime observer pointed out,

"What Clark lacks in knowledge of foreign af-fairs is more than compensated for by the fact that he knows every contour of the hearts and minds of Meese and Deaver and Weinberger have made Mr. Haig appear to be in open war-fare with the rest of the administration.

Authoritative State Department sources say that on at least two occasions Mr. Clark was instrumental in diverting Mr. Haig from a col-lision course that could have had disastrous helps to explain why most State Department insiders discount the rumors that he might move into the national security adviser's job if the president decides that Mr. Allen's problems over his dealings with former Japanese business associates make it advisable to drop

In part, many department officials note pri-vately, Mr. Clark's education in foreign policy matters still has not gone far enough to qualify him for a job whose main function is to keep the president informed and the rest of the administration coordinated on the whole broad range of national security business.

Recently, during a visit to Ireland, Mr.

Clark demonstrated that there still are some very rough edges to his grasp of sensitive is-sues. During a television interview in Dublin, he used some carelessly loose language that implied that the United States was departing from its policy of noninterference in the Irish reunification dispute, and that forced the State Department to rush out a clarifying statement

Haig. But, after the fiasco of his confirmation hearing, it seemed that the pugnacious, internationally known former general would swallow the soft-spoken, judiciously quiet outsider from California in a single gulp. 'I Feel Pretty Good'

When a reporter asked Mr. Haig at a cock-tail party how he felt about having a deputy whose credentials seemed so threadbare in whose creatmans seemed so infreadoare in comparison to his own far-ranging experience in foreign policy and national security, the secretary grinned broadly and replied: "Actually, I feel pretty good about it."

In reality, though, State Department sources agree, the two hit it off well right from the outset. Both basically shared Mr. Reagan's mistrust of Communism and his desire to restore IIS pre-eminence in world affairs; and store U.S. pre-eminence in world affairs; and Mr. Haig, instead of trying to shut Mr. Clark out, carned his gratitude and affection by taking the newcomer into his confidence and assigning him increasingly important responsi-tilities.

Mr. Clark himself recalls, "From the outset, the problems began piling up to the point where there was far more on Al's plate than he could handle. When something new came in that needed immediate attention, I'd say, 'Al, do you want me to take that one?' and he invariably would answer, "Bill, could you do that for me?"

Mr. Clark also insists that there never has been a problem of conflicts between his loyalties to Mr. Reagan and Mr. Haig. He says,
"Since I've been here, Al has known of every communication I've had with the White House, both before and after; and he, in turn, has shared all his information and decision-making problems with me. We don't always agree on how to do some things, but we work together, and he's never held me away from a problem out of concern that I won't do it the wav he wants.'

Much of it is a deeply bitter resentment of the Cubans. "We fought for 14 years against the Portuguese," says Daniel Joao Pedro Malem, 37, a 20-year veteran. "Why? To have

Officially, the FNLA says that it treats all prisoners fairly, but privately a senior commander scowled when asked about what happens to Cuban prisoners. "Frankly, where would we keep them?" he muttered, walking away without elaboration.

Some of the bitterness stems from allegations that the MPLA's Soviet-supplied MiG jet lighters drop napalm and poison gas on FNLA villages. "You never breathe right after the gas," says Alberto Vilela Canelas, a white

Everyone emphasized the importance of avoiding foreign intervention. But the words appeared to mean different things in different mouths. Officials in Prague invariably followed their declarations with a list of complaints about U.S. bankers and politicians, suggesting that denying aid to the Poles would constitute intervention. In Hungary, on the other hand, the implication was that the intervention to be feared was that of Moscow, the only great power whose tanks have rolled through the capitals of Warsaw Pact nations to quell "unrest."

As Hungary's president, Janos Kadar, boarded a train for the journey to Moscow for the celebrations of Leonid I. Brezhnev's 75th birthday last weekend, officials were openly telling Western friends that the best that could be hoped for was a resolution short of Soviet intervention. Solidarity, they suggested, had overplayed its hand and was now a spent force, but perhaps something positive could yet emerge.

Mr. Kadar, after all, began his rule under the worst circumstances, after the suppres-sion of the 1956 revolution, and he has made Hungary an economic showplace and relative haven of free speech in this part of the

Doubts Expressed

Talas Barna, deputy director of the Hungarian Institute for Foreign Affairs, who speaks Polish and was once married to a Pole, doubted that the Polish Communist Party could solve the problem.

The party, he told a recent visitor, has started to disintegrate. Poland already has a pluralistic society, he said, and it will be difficult to destroy, at least in people's minds and hearts. Yet it is unrealistic to expect that the Russians will ever accept a non-Markist Warsaw government.

Hungary stands to suffer considerably from a collapse in Poland. It has profited from détente through trade with the West, and its people's taste for the good life will not easily disappear. Farther north, in East Germany, the Czechoslovak hard line finds its most precise echo. Farther south, in Romania and Bulgaria, Poland seems to matter less both to the ordinary people and

Moreover, many economists caution that, even if the personal savings rate were to rise, that would not necessarily increase in-vestment and productivity.

"Increasing savings only matters when what is limiting investment is capacity, and that is not the case now," said Robert Solow of the

The Paribas France official said he believed that the French company retained roughly 40 percent of the Swiss firm. Pargesa, which last fall acquired just over 52 per-cent of Paribas Suisse, was said by banking sources to have since boosted its stake to 60 percent. The spokesman said the transaction, valued by industry sources at up to 600 million Deutsche marks, will be financed mainly through sales of four hydroelectric plants and of energy stocks. The Bayernwerk supervisory board Tuesday agreed that Bay-crowerk should obtain a majority holding in Contigas, which had 1.8

billion DM of sales in 1980. The board also approved a tights issue to raise 75 million DM of new capital, beginning Feb. 1. Bayernwerk's third-party sales in 1979-80 were 2.4 billion DM. The main purpose of the acqui-

NEW YORK — More than most countries, the United States is a laud of consumers. Of every dollar of income after taxes, on average, 95 cents are speat and only about billions of dollars. But some economists are skeptical that even this limited goal can be achieved, since the economics profession has been notably unsuccessful in sorting through all the factors that determine how much people save. Indeed, some theories that seem the most plausible have turned out not to be substantiated by economic analysis.

combination of factors, including economic, demographic, social, cultural and institutional determinants, although the exact mix has proved chusive. There are even those who maintain that, while the savings rate is below the long-term average, the magnitude of the decline is not

At this point, most economists conclude that savings result from a great and could be attributed to statistical error. Among the wealth of economic data that the government reports, the savings rate is among those with the biggest margins of error. That is because the government calculates the personal savings rate as the difference between two other figures (after-tax disposable because it would represent tens of leaving more room for error than

Furthermore, the income figure itself is somewhat suspect because there are some people who do not report income to avoid taxes, a practice that is mushrooming.
Small errors in the income figproblem with trying to increase national savings through the corporaures show up as large changes in the savings figures. Mr. Friend contends that the margin of error in the savings statistics is about one percentage point. "And within that margin," he said, "there has been no movement in the secular trend for savings." Even if the personal savings rate were to rise, economists say that that would not necessarily translate into a larger pool of savings for investment. For if savings by business and government declined more than household savings rose, total savings in the economy could still fall off. Of the three sectors, business has by far the highest savings ratio. Of each dollar of income, it saves an average of about 45 cents for reinvestment. Therefore, measures that increase business income are likely to result in an increase in to-tal savings. The administration has already moved to bolster business income and consumption outlays), savings by providing for accelerated depreciation of assets. But while many economists appland the investment incentives in the administration's economic program, some say there are also drawbacks to this approach. "One tions is that their savings are very sensitive to the business cycle because their profits are volatile," said Mr. Solow. Another alternative is to increase the savings of the govern-ment sector. While economists are wary about overreliance on the government for maintaining the country's savings rate, many economists say that reducing the feder-al deficit would be the quickest and most effective way to increase "If you want the country to save $1 billion more, then raise taxes by

$1 billion." Mr. Solow said. But this strategy, too, could present problems. "The usual conservative argument against that and there is something to the argument - is that Congress will then go spend that money, and you won't get that increased saving,' Mr. Solow said.

The United States is also losing its competitive edge in more-sophisticated equipment, such as machine tools. In 1965, for instance, the United States exported five times more machine tools than it imported; last year, imports were nearly twice as much as exports. These imports have devastated scores of domestic suppliers. Some have been driven out of business while others are awash in red ink and are retreaching to weather the and are retreating to weather the storm. The U.S. fastener industry, for example, has experienced a 28-percent reduction in capacity since 1977 as more than a dozen companies have folded.

U.S. valve makers have seen a similar reduction in capacity over the last decade. And in the casting industry, which has also been hit by a depressed U.S. market and burdensome federal regulations, at least eight foundries with a combined casting capacity of 1.1 million tons, have closed shop in the last year alone. Nowhere is the problem more acute than for suppliers to the auto industry. Faced with cash shortages, U.S. automakers are shutting their own foundries, which supply roughly half their casting needs. But price is not the only reason many foreign suppliers win out over domestic companies. To many foreign suppliers the U.S. market is top priority. As a result, they bend over backward to guarantee deliveries, often aided by ultra-modern plants. In contrast, because U.S. plants are not always as modern as, say,

Steel From 4 Nations Hurts U.S. Industry, ITC Decides

By Clyde H. Famsworth New York Times Service

WASHINGTON - The International Trade Commission in a 5-0 preliminary finding has deter-mined that imports of carbon steel plate from Belgium, Brazil and Romania and carbon steel sheet from France may be causing material injury to U.S. steelmakers.

The ruling of the quasi-judicial agency, which deliberates over trade-related matters for the government, permits an unusual case to go forward that was brought last month by the Commerce De-

Under the trade statutes this is only the first stage in a procedure that could take many months. Commerce must now make an independent finding as to whether the steel from the four countries is actually selling in the United States below fair value.

Once that determination made, importers become liable for potentially sharply higher levies on the steel, and then the Trade Commission initiates a final investigation of the question whether do-mestic steelmakers have been in-

Commerce is not expected to act until February and may delay its findings until April, a Commerce official said. The Trade Commission then has 120 days to complete its investigation.

The domestic industry has been charging that foreign producers are engaging in widespread viola-tions of U.S. trade laws by selling subsidized steel in the United States at unfairly low prices.

A half dozen major steelmakers, led by the U.S. Steel Corp., have threatened to file massive com-plaints similar in nature to those lodged by the Commerce Depart-ment but against many other coun-tries and involving many other product lines. Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige has warned that such filings would bring down the trigger price mechanism, a voluntary de-vice that is supposed to keep a floor on import price levels.

Under the mechanism, the floor is set on the basis of a formula that takes into account production costs in Japan, deemed the world's most efficient producer. Steel en-tering below the floor is subject to Commerce filed the complaints to show its concern over the domestic industry's plight and to support its contention that trade laws will be enforced. At the same time, Mr. Baldrige has been engaged in delicate negotiations both with the domestic steel industry and the Common Market's Executive Commission in Brussels to strengthen the trigger mechanism and prevent the filings threatened by the industry.

There is now a virtual standoff, but Mr. Baldrige was in contact both with industry and EEC leaders Monday and it is uncertain how long it will last and former public official who served as the state's savings and loan commissioner under Ronald Reagan, has been tapped to fill a key upcoming vacancy on the Federal Reserve Board, the White House has disclosed. Mr. Martin, 58, is expected to be designated vice charman of the board to succeed Frederick H. Schultz, whose term expires at the end of next month. The White House personnel office said it expects to make a formal announcement in the next day or two. The administration has regarded pointment both because of the Fed's crucial role in economic policymaking and because the new

Paul A. Volcker when his term as chairman of the seven-member board expires in August, 1983. The other finalists for the post were believed to be Robert D. Rogers, president of Texas Industries; John E. Sloan, president of the First Tennessee Bank in Nash-ville, and William Dunkelberg of Purdue University. Mr. Martin seems to have prevailed because of his broad experience, which includes a successful stint as chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board during the Nixon administration. He has also been an insurance entrepreneur and college professor.

It was also suggested by one government source, who asked that he not be identified, that Mr. Martin had benefited from a strong tradition that the Fed Board always contain a member from the 12th Federal Reserve District, which includes California.

Novo Industri's main research laboratory in Bagsvaerd, Denmark. At right, the enzyme fermenta-tion and purification facilities in Kalundborg, Denmark. Novo began in a Copenhagen basement.

Novo: 'Old' Firm in a Hot, New Field

By Barnaby J. Feder New York Times Service NEW YORK — Novo Industri, firmly established as the world leader in industrial enzyme production and a major producer of insulin, is wary of the kind of publicity normally associated with biotechnology concerns.

The last thing the Danish firm wants is to be linked in the public mind with the host of new genetic engineering companies which have yet to produce commercially viable

Novo believes it has key strengths the newer companies lack: a long tradition of businessoriented biology research, experience with manufacturing technologies, and a worldwide service and marketing organization.

Most analysts who follow Novo, which last year earned $24 million on sales of $215 million, conclude it is ideally positioned to capitalize on highly publicized scientific ad-vances of the past decade.

Novo was founded in 1925 in the basement of a Copenhagen home by three Danes who set out to stabilize and sell insulin.

Today Novo Industri's sales are almost evenly divided between pharmaceuticals — mostly insulin - and enzymes, and 97 percent of its business comes from outside the country. In recent years, both production and research facilities have sprouted abroad.

The expansion forced Novo to break new financial ground. With its offering last summer of depository shares on the New York Stock Exchange, each worth one-fifth of a share of its class B stock, Novo became the first Scandinavian company traded on both the London and New York exchanges. Be-tween 45 and 50 percent of the B shares are now thought to be in U.S. hands. But control of the company, vested in class A shares, rests with a nonprofit foundation created by the company's foun-

Enzymes account for most of Novo's U.S. business and are its more profitable activity, producing an operating profit of $24 million ket, in which Novo has about a 50-last year, compared with $17 million for pharmaceuticals Processes discovered by Novo as part of its effort after World War II to produce penicillin gave it the ability to harvest and isolate en-zymes — chemicals produced by living cells — that broke up food and blood stains in clothing. Novo plunged into the market as a supplier for detergent companies.

The company got a frightening shock in 1969 when U.K. doctors reported enzyme-dust-related discases among factory workers at detergent companies. Sales, especially in the United States, phimmeted. Novo had to lay off 80 percent of its work force and sales were cut in half to $33 million.

Further studies appeared to satisfy experts about the safety of de-tergent enzymes. However, the im-pact of the scare has lingered. Some 10 percent of U.S. detergents are estimated to include enzymes -- compared with 60 percent in Europe.

Novo President Mads Oevilsen. 41, said in a telephone interview setback was a painful lesson, but served as an occasion for the company to restructure, search for vounger executive talent and adopt a less authoritarian manag

The slow resurgence of the detergent business also stimulated the company to look at other industrial enzymes. Novo soon began to manufacture rennet, which is now widely used in cheese making. In 1975, it developed enzymes that catalyzed production of a sug-ar substitute — high fructose corn syrup —out of com starch.

The new enzymes arrived just as sugar prices rose drastically. Millers quickly seized the opportunity and major sugar users, includ-ing soft-drink makers, have been zyme-based production capacity has come on line. The same enzymes are used in fermenting ethanol out of corn starch, sugge ing a possible huge new market in alternate fuels production.

U.K. Officials Encouraged By Record Exports, Imports

Reuters

LONDON — Britain set records for imports and exports last month percent, with very strong resistance of 526 willing the Tenda Defor imports and exports last mouth while posting a visible trade surplus of £26 million, the Trade Delower level. There are signs that this spread will continue despite the govern-ment's insistence that economic re-

Government amounced.
Government officials said the import and export levels were the strongest evidence yet for Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's claim that the economy is on the claim that the economy is on the toad to recovery.

The October surplus meanwhile was revised drastically upward to £366 million, more than three times the £116-million surplus the department had estimated last month. It said the revision was en-tirely due to exports, which were £250 million above the £4.30 billion that had been estimated.

Exports rose in November to a record £4.76 billion, the department said, but imports rose more sharply, to a record £4.74 billion. Commenting on the figures, Trade Secretary John Biffen said, "They support the view that the economy is beginning to turn up." In the September-to-November period, exports were 17 percent higher than in the same period last year, despite a fall in world eco-nomic activity, he said.

The level of imports has fully re-covered from inventory reductions, tional Coal Board's offer of an 8.6-percent rise in basic rates and a which plunged the economy into The dramatic rise in imports in November, putting the total 42 percent higher than the average monthly value for the first four months of the year, was due mainly to higher shipments of finished manufactured goods, especially cars, the department said.

Projected "invisible" earnings in November — which include services such as insurance, shipping, banking and tourism — were put at £167 million, giving a projected current-account surplus for the month of £193 million. This was sharely down from an unwardmonth of £193 million. Inis was sharply down from an upward-revised estimate of £532 million in October but higher than Septem-ber's £114-million surplus, the department said.

The Treasury is forecasting a current-account surplus for the year of £6 billion, nearly double last year's £3.12 billion.

Economists and government officials now are closely watching the pattern of wage settlements. The high levels set in the 1979-80 wage round were partly blamed for Britain's economic problems. Economists said pay agreements struck in the first five months of Novo's prominence in enzymes has earned it far less renown in recent years than its scientifically and commercially intriguing battle for insulin market share with Eli Lilly & Co. Lilly is the largest producer of the crucial diabetes drug. Novo is second.

Both companies are rushing to develop "human" insulin — that is, insulin that is chemically identical to the substance produced in the pancreas of a nondiabetic person to regulate blood sugar levels.
Insulin on the market today is derived from a pig or cow pancreas.
The slight chemical difference between such insulin and human insulin is suspected of accounting for the allergic reactions of some dia-Lilly was the first, in coopera-

Meanwhile, Novo has been working with Biogen Inc. of Cambridge, Mass., to develop microorganism-based human insulin proection methods.

Five years ago, Lilly had an esti-mated 95 percent of the U.S. insulin market. This year, with sales in the market topping $140 million, Novo's share has grown to between 16 and 18 percent.

Hong Kong supplies about 33 percent of the entire trade in the MFA. Second is South Korea, with about 16 percent.

Mr. Mills said a positive aspect of the new MFA, as far as export-ers are concerned, is that the 10nation EEC and other importers could no longer act unilaterally in cutting quotas. "Any arrangements will have to be mutually acceptable," he said, adding that if there is justification for reducing quotas, "we will consider how we can make up the losses in other real areas of trade."

Referring to a threat by Horst Krenzler, the chief EEC represent-ative to the talks, that the community might withdraw from the MFA if satisfactory bilateral ents were not reached, Mr. Mills dismissed it as a bargaining

For Hong Kong, the EEC's major textile supplier, bilateral nego-tiations with the EEC and the United States will be spread over 1982 because present agreements continue until next December. Hong Kong has less important bilateral agreements with Finland, Sweden, Austria and Canada,

"Even if we have to give a little, I don't think our position as the leading exporter will be affected," Mr. Mills said.

He said the exporting nations had displayed unity throughout the negotiations and that kept the new MFA from being more disadvantageous to them.

SADAT By David Hirst and Irene Beeson. 384pp. £11:50 Faber and Faber Ltd., 3 Queen Square, London WC1 Reviewed by Joseph Fitchett

SHORTLY before his death last Oc-tober, President Anwar Sadat, irritated by signs of disaffection in the hitherto devoted U.S. media, ordered an ABC-TV correspondant out of Egypt because the reporter had re-corded an interview about Sadat with the British journalist David Hirst. Sa-dat's vindictive reaction betrayed his concern about a highly critical biography of the Egyptian leader that Hirst — expelled from Egypt in 1977 — was finishing with his Cairo-based colleague, Irene Beeson.

"Sadat" was completed just before history wrote the final scene of Sadat's life: his assassination at the hands of Egyptian soldiers he called "my sons." Egyptian indifference at his funeral — in contrast to adulation he enjoyed after the October war amounted to national disavowal.

Rocket Ride

"Sadat" recounts how it happened, and explains why. Stylishly written, it is constantly enlivened with telling de-tails. Hirst and Beeson are Middle East correspondants of the Guardian newspaper who (rare among the Western press corps) speak Arabic. They manage to reconstruct an impressive record of how Sadat realigned and rallied a dispirited Egypt. He staggered Israel with the 1973 war. In Henry Kissinger's ensuing negotiations, he mobilized unprecedented Arab and Western support for Egypt, then stunned the world with his visit to Jerusalem and peace treaty with Isra-

The performance - "a rocket ride," Sadat boasted -aroused Western admiration, but the price was alienating the Arab world and, ultimately, Egyptian opinion.

Why it happened is less well known: Sadat, the authors argue, invariably found himself operating from weakness. Against Israel. Against Egypt's sluggish economy. To com-pensate, Sadat sought the initiative by a policy of unexpected concessions that surprised friend and foe alike at every apparent impasse. It was a kind of diplomatic judo that spared Egypt renewed confrontations. But, the authors say, it failed to produce a stable solution.

Sadat's vulnerability was rooted in his supreme triumph. Crossing the Suez Canal and punching through the Bar-Lev line, the Egyptian army punctured assumptions about Israeli mili-tary invincibility and shattered the superpowers' indifference to the Arabs. But Sadat ignored warnings about the audacious Israeli counter-attack across the canal that eventually encircled an Egyptian army, leaving Israel in a stronger military position than before the hostilities. "From that moment on, behind the statesman's, the strategist's pose, he must be seen as more the plaything than the shaper of events," the authors say. While crying victory. Sadat found himself negotiating in a position of inferiority. Sadat's reaction was to settle for a strict minimum for Egypt, thus grati-fying Israel and enticing the United States. But other Arabs were alarmed by what they saw as one-sided conces sions that sacrificed Egypt's long-term interests and betrayed its Arab responsibilities. "Sadat" portrays, Sadat as a supreme opportunist, with a Levantine's eagerness to please even when circumstances dictated a more cautious. stubborn approach.

Their analysis will be disputed by many readers. Some will argue that Israel made enough counter concessions. Others will say Sadat had nealistic alternative, that he behave like a shrewd nationalist. More w say that Sadat, while giving more the he got, nevertheless stood a go chance to recoup his political los after the final scheduled Israeli evaluation. after the final scheduled israea eva-ation of Sinai in 1982. Many will fend Sadat as a visionary who can'd an irreversible psychological chae in the Middle East.

Hirst and Beeson contend tha 58 dat's policies, splitting the rab world, deepened instability in a cla-tile region whose oil is vital. the

Despite Sadat's inability to pine a long-term solution, however, le au-thors say Sadat's apparently afinite compliance endeared him to LS. policy-makers, both politically ad psycy-makers, both politically and psychologically.

It also captivated the intenational audience Sadat craved. He basked in the glow of U.S. media. ("What a president this guy is; he knows the deadlines of every network news show," a visiting U.S. television correspondent marveled.)

What was lacking however, was de-tached analysis — by diplomats and by reporters — about the price of Sadat's popularity in the United States and Israel. His concessions were 120-lating him, making him an im-representative — and therefore ulti-mately unreliable — partner. Yet U.S. policy in the Middle East continued to "put all its eggs in one bastard," a U.S. diplomat is quoted as saying.
Meanwhile Washington failed to muster the diplomatic will to protect Sadat politically.
Only in the final weeks of his rule did U.S. reporting begin to pose hard questions about the outlook in Egypt.
Unfortunately, "Sadat," a credible portrait of the man and provocative

Unfortunately, "Sadat," a credible portrait of the man and provocative analysis of U.S. policy toward Sadat's Egypt, is unlikely to become readily available for U.S. readers. The book—published by Faber in London and widely syndicated in Arab media was rejected by almost a dozen New York publishers, the authors said in an interview. It was unpublishable, several executives replied, because Sadat" challenges key U.S. myths about Sadat, the great ally of the United States and Israel, they said.

No realistic analysis of his legacy, however, can ignore the problems raised in "Sadat" about the gap be-tween U.S. and Arab perceptions of the man.

While Sadat told American interviewers that he thrived on village life and lived on his presidential salary of and rived to his presidents standy of $12,000 a year, Egyptians were gossiping about his increasingly high-handed habit of "acquiring" residences all over Egypt — including a former royal resthouse near the Pyramids.

This house was demolished last week - perhaps as the new govern-ment's symbolic first step in de-Sadatization. "Sadat," unfortunately not pub-hished in time for a debate during his lifetime, remains a timely case study of the West's temptation to prefer clients to sometimes difficult friends.

Dodd, Mead to Be Bought By Thomas Nelson Inc.

New York Times Service

NEW YORK — Dodd, Mead, one of the last major privately held, family owned book publishers in the United States and the longtime U.S. publisher of Shaw and Agatha Christie, will be acquired by Thomas Nelson Inc., the control of the service of the servic the nation's largest publisher of Bibles. A well-placed publishing source put the selling price at $4 mil-lion to $6 million, subject to audit.

Barring last-minute complications, the transfer of ownership of the 142-year-old New York company to the Nashville-based Thomas Nelson is expected in April. Alexander O. Burnham, Dodd's managing editor, said he hoped the arrangement would provide capital and access to Nelson's well-regarded sales force. "This way, we'll be able to compete more successfully for manuscripts," he said.

PLAYERS who fancy their analytical ability are often faced with a piece of paper and the challenge "Look at this hand — would you rather play or defend? If you accept the challenge on today's deal, the lead is the diamond queen against a contract of three hearts.

The deal was noted in a club game by David Brown of Sheffield, Eng-land, who decribed it in Bridge Magazine, the world's oldest bridge periodi-cal, dating back to 1926. West showed length in both minor suits by his "unusual two no-trump" overcall, and South showed extra values by doubling three diamonds. North naturally retreated to three hearts.

The defense perseveres with diamonds, forcing South to ruff, He is now in danger of losing two spade tricks, a trump trick and a club trick, going down two. The best chance to make the contract, as Brown points out, is to do something that appears impossible: Ruff a spade in the dum-

South's first move should be to cash the heart ace and lead his low club. This might enable him to sneak into dummy for a trump finesse, but West alertly puts up his ace and returns a club. South takes his club winners, throwing a spade from the dummy, and reaches this position:

NORTH ♠764 WEST EAST ♦K10 ♦ 0982 ♥ 09 $109 $108 SOUTH QK110

Suppose South plays the ace and five of spades and West wins with the king On any return, he can take the rest of the tricks. The more elegant way is to throw a spade from dummy, then take the improbable spade ruff in dummy and finally finesse in trumps.

It appears, therefore, that South can make three hearts. But the de-fense has a counter. In the diagramed position, West must drop the spade king under the ace and East must then overtake the ten with the queen. This establishes the jack in the South hand, and it wins the next trick. But South never reaches the dummy and is doomed to lose a trump trick.

If you said you could defeat three hearts you were right — but perhaps

One thing he did know was to listen to his parents. It was a closeknit home that Dean Smith, the basketball coach at the University of North Carolina, visited in the Boston-Secor Housing Project in the Northeast Bronx. Mrs. Black had watched the coaches parade through her living room, talking about her son and making their mitches pitches.

But this visit was different. As soon as Smith and his aides left, she told her son, "I liked them the best." Her son remembered that. Without knowing it, when Black decided to spend the next four years of his life here, he became a part of basketball history. Smith is careful to mention that according to the odometers of his coaching staff, there are 491 miles - that is, only 491 miles — separating Chap-el Hill from New York's Lincoln

Twenty-five seasons ago, North Carolina's only national cham-pionship victory was achieved with lineup of five New York-area players. Last Saturday, when the Tar Heels overwhelmed Rutgers, 59-36, at Madison Square Garden, four of them came home.

There was Black, the senior playmaker; Sam Perkins, the 6-foot-9-inch sophomore who played high school ball in Brooklyn; Matt Doherty, a 5-8 sophomore from Long Island's Holy Trinity High, whose versatility and intelligence made him an important player last season; and Chris Brust, a 6-9 senior from Babylon (Long Island) injuries and weight problems.

Of the 21,575 undergraduates and graduate students at Chapel Hill this fall, 2.1 percent are from New York. Of the 7,038 students in 1957, 2.5 percent were from New York. The ratios and the basketball success are similar, but the circumstances are different. The New York players were recruited by necessity. Now, it is by coincidence.

With eight Atlantic Coast Con-ference championships and six trips to the National Collegiate Athletic Association championship tournament's final four since he took the job in 1961, Smith's prior-ity is to go after the most highly qualified players within the state -and then look elsewhere.

Seven of the 15 players are from North Carolina, including Mike Jordan, a 6-5 freshman, and James Worthy, a 6-9 junior who led the team in rebounding last season, was second in assists and steals and third in scoring. When Coach Frank McGuire arrived here from St. John's in 1952, he did not have that huxury. The underground railway brought New Yorkers here because New York was where he could find the play-ers to challenge Everett Case's powerful North Carolina State

Kansas had one last chance and tried to get the ball inside to Chamberlain, a 7-2 sophomore. Quigg stopped the pass, Kearns picked up the loose pass, Kearns picked up the ball and threw it toward the ceiling with two seconds to go.

ball hit the floor. Within minutes, there was free beer on Franklin Street in Chapel Hill. The next day, McGuire and Rosenbluth went home to New York, to appear on The Ed Sullivan Show. To an outsider who traveled with McGuire, it sometimes seemed that he knew every single person in New York City. He would leave Chapel Hill after a game, ride the train from Raleigh all night and appear at a Catholic league game the next afternoon.

Frank's Network

McGuire knew the police he knew restaurant owners by their first names. He knew principals, officials, coaches, fans and players. If he didn't know someone, he knew someone in the parish or he knew a friend who played for him or there was a relative he had taught in his history class at Xavier High School. His friends, especially Harry Gotkin, did most of the legwork. McGuire did the rest. "A lot of coaches couldn't have done what he did," Smith said.

The recruiting budget? "Don't laugh." Smith said. "I remember $5,000."

In the early '60s, three develop-ments derailed what McGuire built: The coach himself left for the Philadelphia Warriors; a threeyear probation for recruiting violations restricted the Tar Heels to the Broax and Tommy Kearns of Bergenfield, N.J.; the center was one recruit outside the area; and, suddenly, the best high school Joe Quigg from St. Francis Prep in players in New York were no long-

Smith, whose Baptist church was the first in Chapel Hill to desegregate, played a significant part in the end of segregation in the town. He added a black walkon player, Willie Cooper, and then recruited Charlie Scott of New York, the first black scholarship athlete at the university.

Maybe This Time

Starting in 1967, Smith won three straight conference titles. This year may be pleasantly different: Top-ranked North Carolina - thanks in part to the still-solid New York connection -- is 5-0 and may again have the guns to take aim at an NCAA championship.

49ers Are Staking Their Claim

By Bob Oates

Los Angeles Times Service
SAN FRANCISCO — Earlier this month at the Washington Square Bar & Grill on Powell Street, a San Francisco 49er fan looked at a companion and said gloomily, "This is where it all ends." By "this," he meant Cincinnati, where the surprising 49ers were taking their 10-3 record into Riverfront Stadium.

His companion, staring into his beer, replied, "I'm afraid you're "But it's been a great roll -- cor-

Correct. Starting 1-3 last September, the 49ers, usually a reliable loser, had won seven straight games — and ultimately 9 out of 10 — to clinch their division before any other National Football League club had won its.

Buzz Words Normally such an achievement starts a team's fans dancing in the streets. But this is a city apart. San Franciscans take immense pride in the 49ers, but they haven't been lighting any bonfires — although the team creamed Cincinnati and then went on to beat Houston and New Orleans to finish the year at 13-3, the league's best record. Fans here tend to be somewhat pessimistic, subdued - restrained rather than rabid. But one recent day on a cable car, an evesdrop-ping visitor caught the buzz words: "Fred Dean," "offensive line," "21-3," "defense," "at the Stick" (short for Candlestick Park) and, of course, "Coach Walsh." Bill Walsh's team has involved and unified the city like nothing else since they built the last bridge. But folks aren't going crazy. "We've been burned before, and I don't mean the big one," said a patron at DiMaggio's Restaurant, alluding to the fire of 1906.

"Frankly, I've sort of looked for them to lose almost every week this year. The Giants, you know, disappoint us all the time. Our college teams are an embarrassment.
The Raiders don't count over here.
The 49ers never have won the [NFL] title. So I'm in a wait-and-

At the San Francisco Chronicle, columnist Art Rosenbaum asked a Los Angeles newspaperman if he could help in getting playoff tickets — at a game in San Francisco — for the paper's employees and other San Franciscans.

"This tells it about the 49ers," said Rosenbaum, a veteran observ-er of his city. "We haven't had a but I've never seen such a demand

It wasn't too many years ago that a South Dakota writer re-turned from the Bay Area and said: "The only thing they worship in San Francisco is their ancestors." That is only slightly hyper-bolic. To a great degree, it is an inward-looking city. Its first fami-lies have for years tended to be the old families. Its most venerated clubs and institutions are the old-

That in part explains the 49ers' long and pervasive hold. Aithough the team has been a steady loser, it is the city's favorite because its roots are so deep. The 49ers were born in a Market Street office in 1946. To a 50-year-old San Franciscan, the bridges, cable cars and 49ers have been here almost since the beginning of time.

Among the gentry, the football team is loved and accepted the way the opera, say, is.

"Losing has never turned off fans of the 49ers the way it affects most other fans," said Leonard Koppett, a former New York Times sportswriter who has relo-cated in nearby Palo Alto.

To 49er fans, winning is a bonus, not an essential. "They're just hap-py the team stopped losing." Koppett said, "the way they're happy when it stops raining."

Koppett detects a note of relief among San Franciscans that the team is getting more successful. Three years ago, many of them found themselves identifying with new coach Walsh, a debonair cosmopolite who seemed just right for a citizenry that thinks of itself as debonair and cosmopolitan.

From Everywhere'

"His style and character appeal greatly to 49er fans," Koppett said. "But in '79 and '80, they were worried by his first two seasons [2-14 and 6-10]. Now these people feel they weren't let down after all. They feel their trust has been rewarded."

Still, those who traditionally follow the 49ers haven't in any real sense been carried away. Thinking of the long "years of deprivation," Diane Heddleston, a fan from Redwood City, said: "A lot of people hadn't wanted to admit they were pulling for the 49ers. There have been so many disappoint-ments. Finally, the fans are coming out -from everywhere.

They're even coming out to the call yet for a Super Bowl ticket - airport now. An estimated 1,500 welcomed the team home after the for anything as there is for the div- - Cincinnati game. "Those were the isional playoffs. They could sell real dyed-in-the-wool fans," said 400,000 seats if they had them. But Terd Glarrow, the 49er ticket man-John Henry Is Horse of Year Bowers by Once Double, was sold LAKE SUCCESS, N.Y. - John four times early in his career for as

4 Weight Records Reported in Russia

From Agency Dispatches

MOSCOW — Three Soviet weightlifters have set world records at a meet being held the Ukranian city of Donetsk, Tass has reported.

Breaking his own 242-pound di-vision records, Leonid Taranenko reportedly had a snatch of 423.5 pounds and a total lift - snatch plus jerk - of 940.5 pounds. His natch was I.1 pounds better than his previous mark and his overall lift 5.5 pounds better.

Adam Saidullaev, in the 198cound division, jerked 409.2 pounds, 1.1 pounds better than the record held by Blagor Blagoev of Bulgaria And 220-pound class Yuri Zakharevich improved by 11 pounds the 412.5-pound mark set by Ota Zaremba of Czechoslovakia in June. ager. "One guy had to be pulled off [quarterback] Joe Montana. He was so happy, he kept beating on Montana's shoulder." In genteel San Francisco there aren't many of that type. The guy was obviously from the suburbs. Or Oakland.

In San Francisco, as elsewhere, there are five kinds of fans: thickand-thin, ho-hum, fair-weather, so-phisticated and socialite. Thick-and-thin types never miss an opening kickoff. The ho-hummers go once or twice a season if there's nothing doing at Charlie's or the opera. Fair-weather fans only turn out for winners. The sophisticated tend to value talent and style; the socialites turn up to be watched, not to watch, "We've got 'em all this year," says police patrolman Larry Mur-dock. "Damn near everybody."

Sugar Ray Leonard, who in 1981 defeated Ayub Kalule for the World Box-ASSOC middleweight crown and Thomas Hearns for the undisputed welterweight title, was named Sports IIhistrated's sportsman of the year late Tuesday. The magazine cited Leonard "for symbolizing in character and performance the ideals of sportsmanship."

as a long reliever While pitching batting practice for the second time in spring training last March, Beckwith jerked his head away from a Jack Perconte line drive and almost imme-diately experienced double vision.

When it persisted when it became almost impossible for him to run or throw a curveball — "I kept bouncing them in front of the plate because that's where I thought the catcher's target was" — the Dodgers sent him back to Los An-

"They tested for multiple sclerosis, a brain tumor, a blood clot," Beckwith said. "And when all the tests were done, they really hadn't found anything. I went back [to camp] thinking that if the doctors weren't concerned, neither was I."

After pitching in one exhibition game, he realized something was seriously wrong. "I went to dinner with friends," he said, "and couldn't even see what I was esting."

He went back to Los Angeles again. Feldon ultimately found Beckwith to be a victim of fourthnerve palsy — he had damaged a cranial nerve and weakened a muscle that governs much of the movement in the left eye. Hoping the condition would cure itself, he advised Beckwith to wait six months before considering sur-

By August, five months having passed without improvement, he decided that his recovery might span much of 1982 and perhaps mean a second summer on the sidelines. Beckwith told Feldon he wanted surgery.

Feldon said there was only 50-50 chance of his regaining enough single vision to pitch again — and that it probably would take two or three operations.

Feldon first attempted to restore Beckwith's balance by surgically weakening a muscle that helps pull the left eye down. When that mid-August procedure failed to cure the double vision. Beckwith had a Sept. 28 operation known as an adinstable recession of the right inferior rectus muscle.

With adjustable sutures attached to the muscle. Feldon created a pulley system that allows

Silent Night? Not at Kurisumasu

Deck the Halls With Yuletide Muzak as the Japanese Embrace Holiday

By Tracy Dahlby

Wishington Past Service

OKYO — When Kurisumasu comes to Tokyo, there are no silent nights. In Roppongi, one of the city's chic shopping districts, the familiar strains of yuletide Muzak blare from the McDonald's and Kentucky Fried Chicken outlets. Brightly lit evergreens dot the teeming sidewalks as shoppers bustle through the cold, pausing before frost-ed shop windows with silhouetted cutouts of Santa and his sleigh.

Taxi drivers lay on their horns in the bumper-to-bumper traffic while gaggles of Japanese office workers, arms linked, careen through the narrow back alleys where neon signs advertising the area's hundreds of res-taurants and bars run up the sides of build-ings like stacks of multi-colored dominoes. By mid-December, the high sense of de-corum and efficiency with which the Japanese normally go about their business has all but vanished as this prosperous, consumeroriented country plunges in its annual binge of year-end merrymaking and gift-giving.

That the Japanese have gripped Christmas with a passion in the postwar era may seem transet to foreignest in an Asian country. strange to foreigners in an Asian country with age-old Buddhist roots and a practicing Christian population of less than I percent of the 117 million inhabitants. This, however, hardly bothers the Japanese, who are old hands at borrowing things foreign and absorbing them with a uniquely Japanese flair. Kurisumasu — "Christmas," an unofficial holiday here - reflects a blend of slick commercialism on the part of Japan's enterprising retailers and a centuries-long tradition among the Japanese of plying bosses, clients, influential individuals and friends with seasonal gifts.

In Japan's rigidly hierarchical society, the custom of giving year-end gifts, called oseibo. was intended in prewar days as a gesture of repaying individuals for personal obligations piled up over the year.

Eye Toward Advancement

Today, such presents — ranging from fancy gift packages of dried seaweed, Japanese green tea and imported whiskey, to considerably more costly items — are often given with an eye toward future advancement.

To a young businessman, a gift given to an immediate boss may be viewed as a way to protect his position in the company pecking order before the battery of annual promotions rolls around in the new year. Parents may feel obliged to make offerings to teachers, especially those at highly competitive pri-vate schools, to help promote their children's interests at grading time.

The overlay of Kurisumasu spirit has helped spruce up the season's once-onerous image. "It's in the Japanese pyschology to thank those we think we owe at the end of the year," explained Masahide Sakauchi, an advertising executive at the Takashimaya department store. "Oseibo used to have a very gray image — people think of canned hams — but Christmas, with all its colorful decorations, is bright and romantic."

Armed with year-end bonuses equal to about three months salary, Japanese workers about three months salary, Japanese workers mob major department stores where the yen for spending is encouraged by computerized gift selection centers. The buying spree usually peaks on the Sunday before Christmas. This year, Takashimaya's main Tokyo store hauled in $7 million in sales on Dec. 20, despite a mini-recession that has caused constructed to the total for much of the season. umer sales to sag for much of the year.

Behind the Madison Avenue-style marketing blitz lurks a host of traumas for ambitious company men who must carefully calculate the dangers of offending their bosses by giving too much or not enough.

It's a real headache," said one junior executive, "because if you give too much, it's not considered proper, and if you don't give enough, it's worse." These offerings may range from a $10 bottle of whisky to designer lighters or tie pins.

Age for Promotion

A senior executive at a major company who regularly receives gifts from his juniors, even though he has openly discouraged the practice, said, "One of my employees used to complain that it was a stupid custom. Recently, however, he has changed his tune and insists he must do something to show his gratitude. He's now approaching 40, which is a critical age for promotion in the company.

While many Japanese companies have tried, with only limited success, to put a stop to this tribute system inside the office, the executive pointed out that the companies themselves spend exorbitant sums on presents for major clients, customers and the government bureaucrats with whom they ist deal regularly.

Although the Japanese tend to see nothing wrong in greasing the wheels of personal and business relationships with gifts — provided the value of the items stays within acceptable bounds — the government moved two years ago to crack down where public servants are

A spokesman for Premier Zenko Suzuki's office said, "Officials should not receive any gifts relating to their jobs, and, if they do, they should send them back." Presents from foreign governments worth more than the equivalent of $100 must be returned or handed over to the proper authorities.

The spokesman suggested, however, that the rules are often difficult to police. The increasing popularity of Christmas in Japan, however, has added a more personal flourish to the season among those in the younger generation of more affluent, family oriented Japanese. And, as in the United States, children have become the center of a now firmly entrenched custom of exchanging gifts among family members.

In the toy section of Tokyo's large Matsuzakaya department store, Yume Nemoto, 23, said, "The Christmas custom has become more established year by year." Wearing a tastefuly tailored Santa Claus costume for her role as "Sister Santa," she explained, People are getting more enthusiastic about buying gifts for their children. Parents come in with their children and let them choose what they want. Then they tell me to wrap up the things in Christmas paper with a note from Santa.

While Santa Claus may be a relative newcomer to Japan, he — or she — appears to have made a hit with Japanese children, despite the fact that they remain a bit shy on the details of his legendary nocturnal rounds. "I don't know where Santa comes from," said Yuzuru Hashimoto, 7, "but I believe in him because I've got a lot of good games from him." Kidaka Sugiyama, 10, who wants Santa to deliver a sewing machine this year, was more explicit: "He comes from the sky. He wears red and white clothes and gives me presents when I'm asieep on Christmas Eve."

So Kamisasa, 11, who got a computer game last year, said, "I never believed in Santa. I knew all the time the presents came from my mother. But I want a soccer ball this

In an effort to turn young skeptics like Kamisasa into believers, major department stores this year have enlisted an army of Japanese Santas who will personally deliver gifts to thousands of Tokyo homes on the night before Kurisumasu.

PEOPLE: Evel Knievel Order en To Pay $12.75 Million

Motorcycle daredevil Evel Knievel has been ordered to pay $12.75 million in damages to a former television executive he injured with an aluminum baseball bat in 1977. Superior Court Judge Lawrence J. Rittenband in Santa Monica, Calif., awarded the civil suit damages to Sheldon Saltman, 50, former vice president of the telecommunications division of 20th Century-Fox, whose left arm and right wrist were injured in the attack. Rittenband, who termed the assault "violent, brutal, vicious, unprovoked and cowardly," ordered the 42-year-old stuntman to pay $2.75 million in general and specif-ic damages and $10 million in punitive damages.

Warren Beatty's "Reds" has been chosen the best movie of 1981 by the New York Film Critics, while top acting awards went to Burt Lancaster and Glenda Jackson. "Reds," about the participation of Americans John Reed and Louise Bryant in the Russian Revolution, edged out "Prince of the City" in voting by the 27-mem-ber group. Sidney Lunet was named best director for "Prince of the City." Best actor went to Lan-caster for his portrayal of an aging numbers runner in "Atlantic City" and Jackson won as the British poet Stevie Smith in "Stevie." Sup-porting-performance prizes went to John Gielgud in "Arthur" and Mona Washbourne in "Stevie." The critics voted special awards for artistry and independence to Polish filmmakers Krzysztof Zannssi and Andrzej Wajda, Zanussi for "Contract" and "Camoutlage" and Wadja for "Man of Marble" and "Man of Iron."

The woman who married Billy Milligan in a psychiatric hospital where he is confined says she has met and dealt with most or all of Milligan's multiple personalities. Milligan, 26, and Tanda Kaye Bartley, 21, were married at the Central Ohio Psychiatric Hospital, in Columbus, Milligan was found innocent, by reason of insanity, of rape, robbery and kidnap charges in 1978, when a Franklin County. judge accepted a report that Milli-gan had 10 personalities. An Obio-University professor, Daniel Keyes, has written a book that says Milligan has 24 personalities. Mrs., Milligan said if she had judged Milligan by what she read, "I'd Milligan by what she read, never have married him. But I've dealt with the different personalities. I know all of them. They know me. I've encountered probably all of them." She said she communicates with the different per-sonalities "on their level, depending on the age and mentality."
